SD National Guard FACT SHEET – Updated June 11, 2011

OC Chad Carlson
SDNG Public Affairs Office

Background:

South Dakota is experiencing record flows of water on the Missouri River as a result of record snowfall in Montana that is beginning to melt and heavy rainfall in eastern Wyoming, Montana and the western Dakotas. As snow melts and rain water flows into streams and rivers in South Dakota, the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers is releasing record flows of water at all the dams on the Missouri River to accommodate water flowing into the upper Missouri River reservoir basin. These record releases on the Missouri River are expected to cause major flooding issues along the river.

On May 27, 2011, the initial S.D. National Guard flood response was directed to the cities of Pierre and Ft. Pierre. Over the Memorial Day weekend, the SDNG added forces to assist in mitigating the emerging threats to Vermillion, Yankton and Dakota Dunes in Southeast South Dakota.

“We continue to provide surveillance of all the levees that have been completed and consider this a very important mission,” said Maj. Gen. Timothy Reisch, adjutant general of the South Dakota National Guard. “The numbers of Soldiers and Airmen in the Pierre and Fort Pierre area has been reduced consistent with the enduring missions that have been assigned to the National Guard. We will continue to support the overall incident with whatever number of Soldiers and Airmen are required to complete our assigned mission.”

Past 24 hours:

“We continue to respond to missions, but they have slowed down,” said Maj. Martin Yost, Task Force 147th operations officer. “We stand by prepared to respond to any missions we might be tasked with. #### In the Dakota Dunes and Yankton area:

“We’ve entered a steady state in our operations,” said Lt. Col. Joe Eining, Task Force 153rd commander. “Sandbagging operations are slowing down; we’re in the phase of sandbagging now in which we’re basically stockpiling them. We’re standing by on a levee system in the Wynstone and McCook Lake area, and we’ll begin patrolling those areas as soon as they are ready.”
